*The government wasn't mandated to dismantle public services**

Philippe Couillard didn't get a mandate from the population to do what he's doing. The Liberals aren't even implementing their own program that they campaigned on during the election.

Given the lack of legitimacy and the fact that Couillard has no mandate to impose his plan to dismantle the State, there are only two possible ways to respond.

First possible response: there's nothing that can be done... Despite the lack of legitimacy for its actions, the government is too determined, so we have to accept the destruction that it is proposing. Once we do that, we already know what the consequences will be. Public services will be drastically reduced. Inequalities in Québec will get significantly worse.

Second possible response: resist the imposition of the Couillard government's radical plans! Resist worsening inequalities. Will we stop the government? Who can guarantee that?

The only guarantee we have is that if we do nothing, we will we will soon find ourselves saddled with the Canadian average: a rapid increase in inequalities and impoverishment of the majority of the population. The only hope of changing this trajectory is to resist the Couillard government's plans. Resist more than we ever have in the past!
